Greeks say Norwegian took secrets

ATHENS — Two members of parliament alleged yesterday that Arne Treholt, a Norwegian official charged with spying, provided Moscow with secret information about American military bases in Greece, Greek relations with NATO, and the European Community.

In a written submission to Parliament, the two charged that Mr. Treholt, honored here last year for his opposition to Greece's 1967-74 military junta, took advantage of his close friendship with Prime Minister Andreas Papandreu to gain access to the Zappeion Palace in central Athens.

Three major ministerial meetings and a summit, marked by deep disagreement about how to resolve the European Community's financial crisis, were held in the Zappeion Palace during Greece's presidency of the Community from July to December last year.

The two members of parliament — Eleftherios Kaloviannis and Ilias Vezdrevanis — alleged Mr. Treholt sometimes had access to proposals for solving the crisis and that he had also given Moscow valuable information about Greek national security, Greek relations with NATO and the American bases here.
